August 10, 2024

Head of Gunderson Dettmer’s data privacy practice, Anna Westfelt, is quoted in Forbes’s article, “Getting AI Past The Finish Line, Responsibly And Ethically.”

In the article it discusses that despite widespread AI use, most companies remain in pilot stages, with strong governance and risk management identified as crucial for AI’s successful and responsible implementation.

Anna highlights the need for corporate culture to support AI policies, stressing accountability, employee training, and the use of vetted tools. She states, “Build a culture of accountability and compliance when it comes to privacy and security, and train employees to apply caution when using AI tools.’ This includes ‘consistent monitoring by the organization’s IT team of AI, together with regular training to make sure employees are aware of the boundaries around the use of AI tools.’”
